Water-Borne Disease

Water-borne diseases are caused by drinking water contaminated with human faeces, urine and other germs.

Most water-borne diseases infect the digestive system, especially the intestines. Some of these diseases are dysentery and diarrhea. The germs of these diseases are released from the body when the infected person defecates or urinates in water or on the ground. When it rains, these faeces are carried into rivers by running water.

If people drink such water without boiling or treating it in any way, they too get infected.

Water-borne diseases are also spread through water sources contaminated by waste from latrines. This is particularly so where the water source is close to pit latrines.

It is therefore advisable that before drinking water from any source, boil it or add chlorine to make it safe for drinking.
